Beckoning Summer

June 2015

Dear Charles,

I hope you are taking advantage of this variable and weird weather to make some sculpture.

This month I will introduce our group to the City of Berkeley to pave the way for us to have works exhibited in Berkeley City Hall. I will give a 5-minute presentation to the Civic Arts Commission, describing who we are and our vision. There won't be time for presenting images -- that will occur at a later meeting.

If you would like to attend, I will soon email details of where and when to our mailing list.

This will be the first step in what I hope is a long productive relationship between Pacific Rim Sculptors and the City of Berkeley.

Your President,
Anya Sophe Behn

From the Editor

Dear Member,

Artists have long paid entry fees for submitting artwork to shows. It is a financial burden for many and an irritant to all.

Recently, the topic of honoraria paid to artists became a point of recent discussion: Are such payments helpful, or are they devaluating?

For example, a recent call for entries for a year-long exhibition promised $500 honorarium for accepted artists. Sounds great at first thought, hmm? But one member noted that amount does not begin to cover production, shipping, installation, insuring and return shipping of the artwork -- much less rental of a piece of artwork for a year-long period.

Certainly exposure is good: newly emerging artists may find the offer appealing; on the other hand, artists with longer track records may question the merit of such calls.

Another member pointed to a growing international movement to compensate artists fairly for exhibitions and productions (WAGE, WageForWork.com), and commented that some countries now require museums receiving public funding to pay artists fees.

This is a growing challenge to the tradition of placing an exhibition's financial burden on the shoulders of the exhibiting artists. Wouldn't it be wonderful if the public -- and governments -- recognized the true value of art and artists?

But change is slow, so for now artists continue to face a dilemma: Exposure is important, but silently accepting the cost burdens effectively encourages continuation of the status quo.

The debate caused me to think of the Greek comedy Lysistrata. What if artists withheld their art as a means to negotiate: would that hasten change? Or in this age of eyes glued to smart-phones and 60-second attention spans, would anyone notice?

As always, I hope you enjoy this issue of your newsletter.

Happy sculpting!
